Entering an open space from which di four lake arms of T verge the ioul a. ul lucerne, we were granted magnificent views in every direction. On its way, the steamer halted at quaint villages, nestling close to the water s edge, at the base of cloud-mantled hig-hlands. Sometimes it would seem that they must lose their foothold and slip into the clear blue depths which mirrored their glances in rippling glee. Proceeding onward, we were more closely embraced by the rugged mountains, which reared their gigantic barriers across our pathway. We seemed to have reached the end of the lake and to be steering directly upon the rocks; but pressing boldly forward, we passed a sharp curve between two precipitous promontories, christened the Nasen, and entered into another and broader bay, commanding a view of one of the grandest of Alpine landscapes. In the background towered the fearfully steep summits of the Mythen, at the base of which was Schwyz; in the middle distance stood Ingenbohl, and in the foreground, Brunnen. On the right were the kingly Sonnenberg and Scelisberg. The shores increased in grandeur. Rounding another headland, we discerned a pyramidal rock, eighty-five feet in height, rising abruptly from the water. It is known as the Mythenstein and bears an inscription in honor of Schiller, who celebrated in immortal verse the deeds ot William Tell. The view from Brunnen is highly r0 mantic. We here entered...
