The Wooing of Eve ACT I The action passes in the drawing-room of John Rodds town house in Mount Street, London. In both architecture and coloring the room suggests a reproduction of early Italian art. Recessed windows R. , with cushioned seat running around. Large chesterfield turned to face windows R. Sofa down R. c. Table with curios, etc. , behind sofa. Double doors up c. Large ottoman down L. Upholstered stool L. c. Door down L. The whole scheme of coloring is in the most exquisite harmony and good taste. There is a deep, yellow fog outside, consequently the room is almost dark. As the curtain rises Bates, an elderly, nervous, timid footman, enters, followed by Cyril Dallas Rokeby Parriscourt, a tall, slight, fair young man of twenty-seven with something of the affectation of a girl of nineteen. The scheme of his whole attire shows thought and care and suggests the highpriest of the religion of clothes. From his well brushed hair to his pointed shoes there emanates a glow of definite, smug satisfaction. He walks down c. and sits on ottoman L. Bates stands c. after closing doors. Bates. Shall I turn on some light, sir Parriscourt. Light Light Oh, yes! Do, please. Bates. (Going to switch, turns on brackets, up v. .) The fog is very thick, sir. (First R. and second L. lights up) Parribcouht. Very! Very thick! (bates turns on lights, switch above door L. When Bate i c....
