Not illustrated. 1872 Excerpt: .or the vicar repent having trusted me with the great iron key. Sands laid the plate of salmon upon the table with a low groan, which he could not suppress. What ails you, John? asked his wife with rough kindness; I am afraid that you have one of your headaches. I have no headache, replied Sands, turning away to get the candle and match-box: he could not have added and no heartache either. What an odd woman that Bell Stone is! exclaimed Nancy, after a short interval of silence, during which John lighted the candle. She was on the other side of the road just as I was passing the schoolhouse; she stood still, watching me as a terrier watches a rabbit-hole, and then took the trouble of crossing the road on purpose to meet me. Good evening/ said I, not wishing to be stopped for a gossip with the widow, I must get home as fast as I can, for it s late, and I ve had a long walk to B. What have you got for it V asked she, in a strange kind of tone, as if there was a deal of meaning in the question, and that not a pleasant meaning. I did not care to make out Bell s meaning, but I thought of a visit which I d paid to the wretched Thoms on my way to town, and a pillow-case which I d given em, so I replied at...
